This is a story about something I did. Something I feel very proud of. I want to share it with you so you know about it, too.
Openness is essential for donors

In the same way that donor conception parents are encouraged and supported in being open with their children, donors also need to be open with their families. With ID release donors and more people connecting with genetic family through home DNA tests, it’s important that everyone who needs to know, knows. Our books can help donors to start the conversation.

Our books can make a huge difference

Our beautifully illustrated books help donors explain to their own children and families why they chose to donate.

Aimed at children aged 5-10, but also useful for the wider family, they provide a foundation for further conversations. Being open from the start ensures there will be no big surprises as the information is already part of the family story.

Support your donors in being open with family

- Tell them about our books – there are versions for egg, sperm and embryo donors, both anonymous and known
- Buy copies to give to your donors to say a personal “thank you” for their gift
- Encourage and support them in starting conversations with their family and their children
- Help them prepare for possible future connections and contact from DC offspring
- Support the work of the Donor Conception Network

“Just as parents are encouraged to share their [children’s] conception narrative from a young age, the books encourage donors to do the same.”
